- Nearly 40% of physicians (2325 of 5829) reported that they would be reluctant to seek formal medical care for treatment of a mental health condition because of concerns about repercussions to their medical licensure.
- Physicians working in states in which medical licensure application questions inquire broadly about current or past diagnosis or treatment of a mental health condition, past impairment from a mental health condition, or presence of a mental health condition that could affect competency were 21% to 22% more reluctant to seek help.
- Physicians who worked in states in which questions on medical licensure applications asked only about current impairment from a mental health condition or included no question pertaining to mental health were less reluctant and thus may be more likely to seek and receive care if the need arose

Oregon's medical license application is the worst in the West in inhibiting help seeking

Medical license application “consistent” if specifically asked re: current impairment from a medical or mental health condition. Initial and renewal refer to first or subsequent application.
